Summary

Scout AI is building the AI brain for defense robotics. Founded in 2024 by Colby Adcock and Collin Otis, Scout is a Silicon Valley-based defense technology company on a mission to enable the largest robot army in the world for the United States military. At the core of Scout's technology is Fury — a first-of-its-kind Vision-Language-Action (VLA) foundation model designed for multi-domain defense. Fury transforms uncrewed platforms into intelligent, mission-adaptive agents capable of operating across ground, air, sea, and space. It enables warfighters to command entire fleets of heterogeneous robots in natural language, turning the traditional one-to-one operator-to-robot model into a one-to-many force multiplier. Unlike brittle legacy autonomy systems, Fury is platform-agnostic, lightweight, and built to operate at the tactical edge — in GPS and communications-denied environments, with as little as a single camera stream. Its architecture supports adaptive learning, secure over-the-air updates, and COTS hardware integration for rapid, low-cost deployment. Scout emerged from stealth with a $15M seed round and two Department of Defense contracts, and in its first year publicly demonstrated a fully autonomous, end-to-end strike mission executed by AI agents. The company has since raised a $100M Series A to accelerate Fury's development and expand its footprint across the defense ecosystem. The fundamental challenge in defense robotics isn't hardware — it's intelligence. Scout is solving it.Twitter:https://twitter.com/CelestinBobbyWebsite: https://job-boards.greenhouse.io/scoutai
